

EDITORIAL

Some editorials are written quickly with ease and pleasure. This applies as we announce our successes, new members of staff or deliver interesting articles to our readers. In the past, we were fortunate enough to enjoy writing many of said editorials, the journal was prospering and such achievement would not be possible without a dedicated team surrounding the journal and you, authors who publish their work through us.

Unfortunately, there are bleak moments in life when writing an editorial is incredibly difficult and sad. One of such moments occurred recently. Doc. RNDr. Eva Tesaříková, CSc. has passed away after losing a battle with an exhausting disease. She was a long-term colleague at EMI, a scientist who stood at the birth of our journal and, until recently, still was an active member of our editorial board. Eva Tesaříková brought her scientific expertise and perspective to the journal, remained with us for nearly 7 years and deserves an acknowledgement for her help in our beginnings and later years. She did not like excessive chattering and pathetic orations and therefore, today's editorial will be very brief. Thank you, Eva, for everything you have done for the journal and your legacy that remains.

Michal Menšík
Moravian University College Olomouc

Doc. RNDr. Eva Tesaříková (* 3.3. 1948 – † 27.5. 2016), a scientist in the area of logic and set theory, statistics and probability, professionally focused on research into nonlinear regression and since 2009 was a founding member of the editorial board of EMI journal.